Manassas Battle.

Six Regiments—The Brunswick Company.
We have received from a correspondent account of the late action near Manassas Junction, and as our 5th Regiment in which is our Brunswick Company of Volunteers, were in the engagement, we give some particulars of the occurrences of the day, which may be interesting to our citizens.

Sunday morning our army under Gen. McDowell were in position in and around Centreville, a few miles this side of Bull's Run, which is four miles east of Manassas Junction. The Regiment was ordered to be ready for the march at 2 o'clock A. M. The companies were called at 1:12 and the Regiment moved at 2:12. The Brunswick Company paraded with 72 men besides officers, and their organization was then very perfect and every man eager for battle. After marching about one mile the troops halted for two or three hours, until sun rise; the march was then resumed, passing Gen. Tyler's Division, and, in the direction of Bull's Run, arrived at the position of Gen. McDowell and Staff. The troops then rested 2½ hours. Soon after the halt, cannon in the distance commenced playing, and the battle began. Howard's Brigade, and probably the whole of the third Division were ordered forward on a road leading to the right. The day had become very hot and the men began to suffer much from thirst, heat, and fatigue, carrying each an india rubber blanket, a woolen blanket, haversack, with three days rations, and forty rounds of ammunition. The road perfectly level and plains covered with woods, they could see nothing of what was transpiring in other parts of the field. Artillery was continually playing to their left. At length they commenced "double quick," which means steady run, the men suffering much and had no water. After marching thus some six miles, the country opened, changing to rolling hills and slopes, and the woods to grass and gravel fields. When the order to the Brunswick Company was given, "by platoon into line," about one third had fallen out from utter exhaustion. The men forced promptly, however. After gaining the open country, although the Company was very much reduced by exhaustion, they hurried forward without rest, the men crying in agony for water, but keeping their places in the ranks until they dropped. The Regiment soon met a steady stream of fugitives of every corps mixed up together, hurrying their retreat and carrying many wounded to the rear. 2

At this time an officer rode up in front of the Regiment, and reported that the enemy was in retreat. After giving three cheers, the Regiment rushed up a hill and full under the fire of the enemy. One of the officers says, "I understood full well that our Division was routed, and that our Brigade was moving up to cover their retreat; but I did not suppose that the whole army was defeated." The Regiment moved on to the battle field, and passed a long ridge under a terrible fire from the enemy's rifles and rifle cannon, balls, and shells. After a short halt, the Regiment was re-formed, and Gen. Howard gave the order, "Forward brave remnant of the 5th," when the Regiment rushed over hills and through woods, right down in the face of the enemy. A battery of rifled cannon were playing directly on the colors of the Regiments, and rifle musket balls flew thick—not a man shrank—the Battalion marched steadily on until ordered to halt and commence firing. At this time there were in the Regiment from 130 to 200 men in the ranks. They fired 5 or 6 rounds when they were ordered by Colonel Donnell to retreat. They retired in column thus and re-formed in the hollow from which they started. An officer of the Company says, "I marched by the colors and rallied the Battalion on them three times. The third time I ordered the color bearers to follow me, and, assisted by Lieut. Small, took every straggler of the 5th Maine, and put them behind the colors. I soon had about 150 men whom I marched steadily on, on the left of the main road through the woods. Then occurred to me for the first time, the idea of coming off the field. I determined to bring off the colors and the remnant of the Regiment. On Sunday evening we returned to our camp of the morning, behind our reserves at Centreville. About 7 P. M. we formed and marched to Fairfax Court House, where we slept one hour, and then continued our march to this city. We arrived here safe—our men behaved nobly—fatigue killed them. Before we left the battle field, Lieut. Kennington had given out from exhaustion, and is now missing, either killed, or wounded and a prisoner. He behaved bravely, and if he has fallen he has done so nobly. Lieut. Small has also done his duty nobly. He was by my side all the time. Howard's Brigade made the last attack, last rally, and returned in better order than most of the troops. The D. Company brought off the colors of the 5th Regiment. We went nearer Manassas Junction than any other Regiment."

The Captain of the Brunswick Company speaks in the highest terms of his men—his misnamed officers, and of the men he says, "I do not think any of the Brunswick boys are killed. They all stood fire well." Of himself he says, "I had a fair opportunity to study the nature of the projectiles used in modern warfare."
